How Olympic Judo Works

The goal of Olympic Judo is to throw the opponent to the ground, pin the opponent on the ground, or force them into submission. Two judokas face off in a four-minute contest.

The contest ends immediately if an ippon is scored. An Ippon can be scored by throwing the opponent down on their back with force, holding an opponent on their back for 20 seconds, or by the opponent tapping out.

An ippon is difficult to achieve, so another way to score is by earning a waza-ari. A waza-ari is scored for a less-powerful throw than an ippon or holding an opponent on their back for 10 seconds. Two waza-aris equals an ippon, so the contest is over if two waza-aris are scored by one judoka.

If the score is tied at the end of the four minute timer, the contest moves to golden score where the next waza-ari or ippon wins the match.

A judoka can be assessed a shido for committing a penalty such as using an illegal grabbing technique or showing excessive passivity. If a judoka is assessed three shidos in a single contest, the match ends and the other judoka is declared the winner (called a hansoku-make)

The competition in the Olympics is divided into 7 weightclasses for both the men's and women's competition. Each judoka will be put into their class' respective bracket and the last judoka remaining in the bracket wins the gold medal.

The Tokyo games introduced the mixed team event, and the format returns in 2024. 18 teams made up of both men and women compete in a bracket. Two countries face off and alternate through the judokas on the team. The first team to claim four victories wins the match and moves on to the next round. The top four seeds in the tournament earn a first-round bye to the quarterfinals. France defeated Israel, Netherlands, and Japan to claim the inaugural gold medal in Judo Team.
