How Olympic Rowing Works

The goal of Olympic Rowing is pretty straight-forward: cover a distance of 2,000 meters as quickly as possible.

There are two disciplines in rowing: sweep rowing and sculling. In sweep rowing each athlete uses single oars and in sculling athletes use two oars that are on opposite sides of the boat.

There are 14 different rowing gold medals being awarded in 2024. Each event differs depending on whether it is a male or female event, the number of rowers, and if sweep rowing or sculling is used. The lightweight double sculls events require athletes to meet a certain weight requirement.

Each of the 14 events begin with heats where up to six individuals or teams compete at once in a single race. The top three finishers in the heats advance to the semifinal round. However, if an individual or team fails to make the top three, they aren't out of the competition just yet. Instead, they'll head to the repechage round where they will have another chance to make the semifinals.

The semifinals will trip each event field to six and the finals will be a winner-take-all race for the gold.
